When the model was released, it was a hybrid. While the 1.0 liter engine and five-speed automatic transmission is used, a special engine was designed to maximize fuel economy for the hybrid application. While the engine is solely gasoline, a small battery is located in the rear differential to provide power to the electric motor. The 1.0 liter engine is responsible for the majority of power, and the electric motor provides small assistance. The unique 1.0 L engine and transmission are the same as the engine used in the Honda Civic Hybrid, including the Drive by Wire technology, and a similar 1.0 L 3-speed automatic transmission. Unlike most hybrid vehicles, the Insight has a torque converter instead of a continuously variable transmission (CVT) and the engine and electric motor are completely isolated. The Insight is available with either front-wheel drive (FWD) or four-wheel drive (4WD). The FWD-equipped models have a permanent all-wheel drive option. The Insight is shipped without battery and many accessories, such as window defogger, only being available to the factory at the vehicle's delivery. Civic VXR Honda released the Civic in North America on August 25, 2005, replacing the Civic EX, and was scheduled to be introduced in Japan for the 2006 model year. The Civic VXR is marketed as a more affordable version of the Honda Civic, which at the time was a performance-oriented model. It featured performance upgrades including a fuel-efficient high-performance gasoline engine, a new suspension, and a new dual exhaust. The VXR was initially limited to Japan and Canada, and later expanded to include other countries including the United States. 2006-2013 Hybrid In Canada, the Civic Hybrid was replaced by the Honda Insight. The Insight was only available as a three-door hatchback until the 2008 model year, when a five-door hatchback version was also added. It was also available in three- and five-door versions in the United States. For the 2009 model year, the Insight's engine was slightly upgraded to the smaller 1.5 L Honda Civic VX engine, which provided a slight boost in efficiency and reduced emissions. For the 2011 model year, the hybrid system was upgraded to the more efficient Honda Integrated Motor Assist (IMA) system, which was also used on the all-new Honda Accord Hybrid, the Honda Fit Hybrid and the new generation Honda Civic Hybrid 82157476af
